Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a muffler for pipes, for pipes which are driven to run with high-pressure fluids such as engines for automobile use. 2. Description of the Related Art Known mufflers for pipes include a muffler of a type where a pair of cylindrical case members are joined to each other by an annular sound-deadening material held between the case members, a muffler of a type where a pair of cylindrical case members are joined to each other by expanding ends of a pair of metal plates, and a muffler which is formed as a hollow casing having a pair of inner walls. The muffler of a type where a pair of cylindrical case members are joined to each other by an annular sound-deadening material is disclosed in Japanese Unexamined Utility Model Publication No. 52-38896 and an example of mufflers of the type where a pair of cylindrical case members are joined to each other by expanding ends of a pair of metal plates is disclosed in Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 64-21844. However, the mufflers of the types described above have a problem in that noises emitted from the interior of the cases are abruptly changed at the edge portion of a gap formed between the inner walls of the cylinders. That is, since the interior of the mufflers are partitioned into two by the inner walls, noise generated within one cylinder has difficulty in being transmitted to the other cylinder. In other words, the mufflers of this type cannot efficiently attenuate a sound within each of the cylinders. This makes the mufflers unsuitable for high-noise vehicles. Further, in the type of the muffler formed as a hollow casing having a pair of inner walls, the shapes of the case members are complicated and the outer diameters of the case members are increased. This makes the muffler have high weight and make assembly of the muffler troublesome and difficult, thus also making the muffler unsuitable for high-noise vehicles. In addition, since the case members cannot be formed by presswork, production of the muffler requires a lot of time and
